Not Being Oneself: A Critical Perspective on 'Inauthenticity' in Schizophrenia.

Abstract: The task of being oneself lies at the heart of human existence and entails the possibility of not being oneself. In the case of schizophrenia, this possibility may come to the fore in a disturbing way. Patients often report that they feel alienated from themselves. Therefore, it is perhaps unsurprising that schizophrenia sometimes has been described with the heideggerian notion of inauthenticity. The aim of this paper is to explore if this description is adequate. We discuss two phenomenological accounts of schizophrenia. Binswanger's account of schizophrenia as a form of inauthenticity and Blankenburg's account of schizophrenia as a loss of common sense, which seems construable as a loss of inauthenticity. We argue that the accounts are highlighting aspects of the same underlying phenomenon, viz. schizophrenic autism. Moreover, we argue that Binswanger's description of schizophrenia as a form of inauthenticity is inadequate and we discuss experiences of self-alienation in schizophrenia. I Introduction

The global-mean surface air temperature record has been broken four times during the 1990s (1990, 1995, 1997 and 1998) ensuring that the present decade has been the warmest since 1860, when the instrumental series of global-mean surface air temperature commences. Estimates of Northern Hemispheric temperature over the last 1000 years (Jones et al., 1998; Mann et al., 1998) also suggest that the 1990s have been the warmest decade this millennium for the Northern Hemisphere. Since global temperature in 1999 is unlikely to be as warm as in 1998 (owing to a reversion of the Pacific from an El Niño to a La Niña mode; NOAA, 1999), it would appear very likely that as we end this millennium the world will have just experienced its warmest year
